

Increase Cost Savings via Efficiency Measures

Rocket Software surveyed 275 U.S. based IT directors and VPs in companies with 1,000+ employees to determine their current IT challenges and their approach to modernizing their IT infrastructure.

The current economic landscape has meant budget crackdowns and layoffs across all industries — especially in the technology space — with more workers laid off in 2022 than in 2020 and 2021 combined. This has left organizations scrambling to find ways to make up for lost budget and talent, and modernizing their IT systems and processes for efficiency has become a necessary strategy.

62% of IT leaders have a much greater focus on efficiency in IT organizations today due to the economic landscape.

As IT leaders feel pressure from the C-Suite to cut costs and optimize resources, respondents ranked faster DevOps processes, automated processes, and increasing overall output as the top three measures to increase efficiency.

DevOps: As IT teams evolve away from traditional software development workflows, DevOps has emerged as the best way to accelerate product improvements, and increase efficiency and output.

58% of IT leaders consider DevOps a top priority.

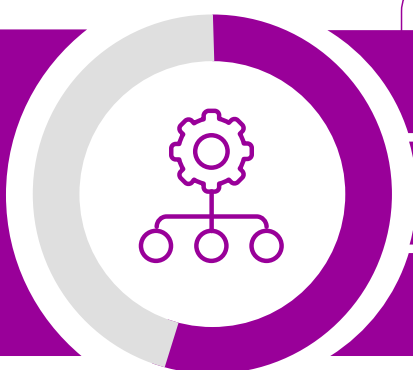

The benefits of DevOps include:

- Increased speed
- Improved collaboration
- Ease of scalability

Automated Processes: Enterprises store and work with vast amounts of data, so effective processes for access and handling of information is critical for overall efficiency.

57% of IT leaders consider automation a top priority.

Incorporating automation:

- Reduces and streamlines workloads of IT professionals
- Improves data usability for C-Suite execs
- Saves organizations on costs

When asked where their greatest need for tools is to help modernize their IT infrastructure, respondents said:

Automation with legacy applications.

Workload automation and orchestration.

To be ultra efficient, companies need to increase their overall outputs—do more, pay less.
